Transnational Macroregion of the Jewish Diaspora

Institutional Orientation Framework

Preliminary proposal — Version 1.0

Open for consultation

Purpose and status

This document sets out possible institutional directions for discussion. It does not establish an organisation, confer legal status, create powers, or grant a representative mandate. Every proposal remains subject to public consultation and a later, transparent founding process.

Part I — Nature and scope

1. The Macroregion is proposed as a transnational civic and political cooperation framework for Jewish life in the Diaspora. 2. Its initial focus may be Europe, with a long-term perspective open to global cooperation. 3. The term “Macroregion” describes the project's political concept; it does not imply recognition under European Union law or the existence of a public authority. 4. The initiative should complement, not presume to replace, existing Jewish communities, umbrella bodies and organisations.

Part II — General objectives

5. Strengthen cooperation among Jewish individuals, communities and organisations across borders. 6. Promote pluralism, equal dignity, religious freedom, cultural continuity and protection against antisemitism. 7. Explore mechanisms for articulating shared concerns in European and international settings without claiming powers that have not been granted. 8. Develop practical projects through transparent priorities and measurable objectives.

Part III — Founding principles

9. Pluralism: Orthodox, Masorti, Reform, Reconstructionist, Humanistic, secular and other Jewish perspectives may participate on an equal basis. 10. Political autonomy: no single party, government, religious denomination or organisation should control the initiative. 11. Democratic legitimacy: any representative role must arise from agreed, transparent and inclusive procedures. 12. Transparency: decisions, funding, conflicts of interest and accountability mechanisms should be disclosed under clear rules. 13. Community autonomy: participation must respect the independence of existing communities and organisations. 14. Relationship with Israel: dialogue and a meaningful relationship with Israel may coexist with political autonomy and criticism of particular policies; no single position on Israeli politics should be required.

Part IV — Participation

15. Individual participation should be possible, including for Jews who are not affiliated with an established community. 16. Collective participation should be possible for communities, associations and other eligible organisations. 17. The criteria for Jewish identity, affiliation, admission, suspension and appeal must be developed through consultation and stated clearly. 18. No final eligibility rule is adopted by this preliminary document. 19. Participation should be voluntary and must not be presented as endorsement of every position or future decision of the project.

Part V — Representation: open questions

20. The representation model remains open. Options for consultation include direct individual participation, representation through communities and organisations, a mixed model, or a multilevel structure. 21. Consultation should examine how to balance individual equality, communal autonomy, geographic diversity and the participation of smaller or less institutionally connected groups. 22. Any future system should define mandates, terms, selection or election procedures, recall or replacement mechanisms, minority safeguards and conflict-of-interest rules.

Part VI — Possible institutional components

23. A transnational assembly could, if adopted, serve as a deliberative forum. Its composition and powers would need to be defined by a founding instrument. 24. A coordination council or executive body could carry out decisions within a limited and accountable mandate. 25. A presidency or spokesperson role could provide external communication but should not claim authority beyond the mandate conferred. 26. Advisory panels and working groups could address rights, education, culture, research, antisemitism and international cooperation. 27. An independent ethics, audit or review mechanism could be considered once the scale and legal form of the organisation are known. These are options for discussion, not existing bodies.

Part VII — Relations and areas of work

28. Relations with European institutions should be developed transparently and in accordance with applicable rules; any consultative status would need to be sought and granted through the relevant procedures. 29. Relations with Jewish organisations should be based on dialogue, cooperation and respect for their existing mandates. 30. Possible work areas include Jewish cultural and educational life, research, freedom of religion and belief, Shabbat accommodation, antisemitism prevention, equal participation and cross-border projects. 31. Any public statements should distinguish agreed positions from personal views and should accurately describe the project's status.

Part VIII — Roadmap and consultation

32. Stage one: publish the proposal, invite contributions from individuals and organisations, and record the scope and methodology of consultation. Stage two: publish a report summarising contributions, including disagreements and unresolved questions. Stage three: prepare alternative institutional models and assess their legal, financial and practical implications. Stage four: if there is sufficient support, convene an agreed founding process and adopt statutes or other constitutive documents. Stage five: only after legitimate constitution should the organisation consider formal representation or applications for consultative status. 33. No stage should be treated as completed until its outcome is documented and publicly communicated.

Questions for consultation

How should individual and collective participation be balanced? What eligibility criteria are fair and workable? Which representation model is most legitimate? What protections are required for pluralism and minorities? What priorities should be pursued first? How should funding and conflicts of interest be disclosed? What relationship should be maintained with Israel and existing Jewish organisations?

Concluding provisions

This framework is a preliminary discussion paper. It does not constitute a charter, statute, legal entity or representative institution. No person or body may infer from this document a mandate to speak on behalf of the Jewish Diaspora. Changes should be tracked, consultation results summarised and any later adopted text clearly distinguished from drafts.

How to use this document

Readers are invited to submit reasoned comments, alternative proposals and questions. Contributions should indicate whether they may be quoted publicly. Personal information should be minimised and handled carefully. The project should publish a transparent summary of the consultation while respecting privacy.

STATUS: Draft for consultation only. This document does not establish an institution or confer a representative mandate.
