Transnational Macroregion of the Jewish Diaspora

Founding Manifesto

A plural voice for a transnational people

Draft for public consultation

Preamble

Jewish life is transnational. Individuals, communities and institutions live across borders, languages and cultures, while maintaining diverse forms of Jewish religious, cultural and secular belonging. This proposal seeks to explore whether a shared framework can strengthen cooperation and enable a plural, autonomous voice for the Jewish Diaspora.

1. Unity in plurality

Jewish life contains many traditions and perspectives, including Orthodox, Masorti, Reform, Reconstructionist, Humanistic, secular and other expressions. No single current should claim exclusive authority over the whole Diaspora. Cooperation must respect disagreement and preserve the autonomy of each participant.

2. A transnational reality

Jewish identity and communal life extend beyond the borders of any one state. The proposed Macroregion is a framework for connecting people, communities and organisations across countries. It is a political and civic project, not an existing legal macroregion or a recognised international institution.

3. Autonomy and responsibility

The initiative should remain autonomous from any single religious denomination, political party, government or organisation. Its credibility must rest on transparency, accountability, pluralism and practical cooperation. It should respect existing institutions and seek dialogue rather than claim to replace them.

4. An autonomous relationship with Israel

The initiative recognises the importance of Israel to many Jews and the diversity of relationships Jews maintain with the State of Israel. Friendship, dialogue, responsibility and political autonomy can coexist. Support for Israel’s right to exist in security does not preclude criticism of a government or policy; no single political position on Israeli affairs should be a condition of participation.

5. Identity and participation

The project should make room for Jewish individuals, including those unaffiliated with established communities, as well as communities, associations and other collective participants. Participation criteria must be developed openly and fairly, with respect for different Jewish traditions and lived identities. Documentation alone should not be treated as a substitute for a meaningful, voluntary Jewish identity, and no final eligibility rules are established by this draft.

6. Rights and freedoms

The initiative seeks to promote equal dignity, protection against antisemitism and discrimination, freedom of religion and conscience, and the ability to sustain Jewish cultural, educational, linguistic and communal life. It also supports reasonable accommodation for Shabbat and other observances, consistently with fundamental rights and applicable law.

7. Democracy, transparency and representation

Any future representative structure must derive legitimacy from a real, inclusive and transparent process. Its electoral or delegate model remains open to consultation. Rules should address accountability, conflicts of interest, financial transparency, minority protections and the limits of any mandate. Until such a process takes place, the initiative does not represent the Jewish Diaspora and cannot claim a representative mandate.

8. Concrete cooperation

The initiative may develop practical projects in education, research, cultural life, intercommunal dialogue, rights protection, responses to antisemitism and cross-border cooperation. Priorities should be selected with participants and assessed openly, according to their public value and feasibility.

9. An open project

This manifesto is a starting proposal, not a constitution or a final declaration adopted by a representative body. Its purpose is to invite scrutiny, criticism and constructive contributions from individuals, communities, researchers and organisations. The project should evolve through consultation and documented decisions.

Concluding declaration

The Transnational Macroregion of the Jewish Diaspora is, at this stage, a proposal in development. It is not a constituted institution, does not possess legal recognition as a representative body, and does not claim to speak on behalf of the Jewish Diaspora. Any future mandate must be earned through participation, democratic legitimacy and accountability.

STATUS: Draft for consultation only. This document does not establish an institution or confer a representative mandate.
